Information withheld.

Minister in cancer row

Menzies institute rejects Jackson claim about research

THE MERCURY, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 28, 2004

EVIDENCE: RESEARCH

BY ELLEN WHITTEN

By Ellen Whitten

The Jackson Institute, which is conducting a major review of the Menzies Institute's claims about cancer research, has said it will not release its findings to the public until a hearing is held later this year.

The institute has been criticized for its research into the causes of cancer, and has been accused of misleading the public.

The hearing, which is being held by the Senate committee on health, is expected to last for several weeks.

The institute has said it will not release its findings until the hearing is completed.

The institute's director, Professor John Menzies, said the institute had conducted a comprehensive review of its research and had found that its findings were reliable.

The institute's research has been criticized by scientists and other experts, who have said that the institute's findings are not supported by the evidence.

The institute has also been criticized for its relationship with the government, which has provided the institute with funding for its research.

The institute has said that it is committed to conducting research that is rigorous and evidence-based.

The institute has also said that it will continue to conduct research into the causes of cancer, and that it will continue to work with the government to ensure that its research is funded.

The institute has also said that it will continue to conduct research into the causes of cancer, and that it will continue to work with the government to ensure that its research is funded.

The institute has also said that it will continue to conduct research into the causes of cancer, and that it will continue to work with the government to ensure that its research is funded.